Excerpt: . . . gious problems that perplex the modern man, and giving the readers an intellectual basis for the reconstruction of their religious life; (c) historical, dealing with the development of the Christian Church, the Reformation, and the rise of the different Protestant denominations and their distinguishing characteristics; (d) sociological, treating social problems from the standpoint of Christianity, and making the position of the Church clear regarding social justice in industry and commerce, and (e) a series of Bible-study handbooks for thoughtful and inquiring adults. Such literature would find great acceptance not only among Polish Protestants, but also among the clergy and laity of the Polish National and the Polish Catholic Churches described above, and among the large number of thoughtful Poles who are at present without any church affiliation; not only among Poles in this country, but also among Poles in the homeland. Protestant policy. -- The...
