Dr. Burton. The closing years of Dr. Bushnell's life seemed, to those who knew them intimately, almost as much the opening years of the life to come. The twilight was gently falling on the things of this world, but already the day dawned that was to succeed the brief night. His few public ministrations of a later date than 1870 have found their true place in the foregoing chapter. Though he showed in them his wonted fire and power, he was no longer capable of sustained effort; and the work he had to do for the world must, in future, be done in seclusion, and little by little, as he was able. Yet this period of detachment was saved from much of the pain that often attends it, by the great gains he made. It was not a time of cessation, as of a life that was going out, but had a work of its own and growth and motion...
